Freed in Christ to serve the neighbor
By Robert C. Blezard

What does it mean to be a follower of Jesus? Christians of every age, including our own, have asked this question, and the answers have ranged all over the religious landscape. Martin Luther provided us with guidance that still directs the hearts and minds of the faithful: We are members of “the priesthood of all believers.” As Lutherans begin the second 500 years of our faithful journey together, this concept may provide a way forward.

Exercise 1: What kind of priest?
Luther developed the idea of “the priesthood of all believers” to describe how every moment in the life of every Christian is holy, and that through our ordinary occupation we serve God and neighbor. What does the priesthood of all believers mean to you? Using a whiteboard or sheet of newsprint to keep notes, discuss these questions:

• Who is a “believer-priest”?
• What responsibilities would a believer-priest have, and why?
• What specific things would a believer-priest do, and why?
• How would a believer-priest engage with other believer-priests?
• How would a believer-priest engage the world, including unchurched people?

Now using your notes, together write a “job description” for a believer-priest.

Exercise 2: “Me? A believer-priest?”
Prepare for this discussion by asking study participants to write briefly on this question: What does it mean for you to be a follower of Jesus? (This is just for the participants’ eyes. No one has to share unless they want.) Give about five minutes for this.

Using the job description your study group drafted in the last exercise, discuss:

• Do most Lutherans see themselves as believer-priests? Why or why not?
• What would it take to train or inspire Lutherans to live more like believer-priests?
• What’s the difference between a believer-priest and a disciple?
If every Lutheran took believer-priesthood or discipleship seriously, how would our church change? Our country? Our world?

Referring to your answer to the opening question, do you see yourself as a believer-priest, disciple or something else? Explain. (Sharing is, of course, voluntary.) In what direction do you need to go, and why? How can you move in that direction?

Exercise 3: Love your neighbor

In Mark 12:29-31, Jesus identifies loving our neighbors as ourselves as the second greatest commandment, after loving God with all our being.

What does it mean to love our neighbors? What does it mean to love our neighbors as ourselves?

Why are some people hard to love? Can you think of examples? Does Jesus command us to love only those people who love us and who are easy for us to love? What’s a Christian to do?

Can we truthfully say that we love our neighbors if we speak disparagingly of some people, such as those who have different political views, who belong to different faiths, who identify with different races, who come from other parts of the world, who speak different languages? Explain.

Why is it sometimes quite easy to speak ill of neighbors with whom we have no interaction, such as religious groups in another section of the world, or people of a different race with whom we don’t have any real interaction? How can we love them better? Why does God command us to try?

Is neighborly love simply a feeling that we experience in our hearts? Why or why not? If it is more than an emotion, what is it?

Who are the neighbors in your community, your congregation and our world? How well do you “love” them? What would loving them as yourself mean to you?

For what reasons is loving God with all our being and loving our neighbors as ourselves the very keys to being a believer-priest?

Exercise 4: God’s work. Our hands.

Our denomination’s insightful slogan carries a great deal of meaning in just four simple words. Break into pairs or trios, and then take turns explaining “God’s work. Our hands.” to one another as if your partners were non-Lutherans or unchurched individuals. Then coming together as a class, discuss:

What exactly is meant by “God’s work”? What makes it God’s work?
Study guide: Freed in Christ to serve the neighbor continued

- What is meant by “Our hands”?
- What’s the connection?
- How does it relate to the vocation of the priesthood of all believers?
- What does it mean for me in my life?

Exercise 5: Self-centered

Luther taught that sin causes us to be “curved inward” on ourselves—so absorbed with ourselves and our self-interest that we become isolated and oblivious to our God and the needs of our neighbor.

- How would you unpack this concept?
- What would being “curved inward” look like in daily life? What attitudes and behaviors would mark this?
- What is sinful about being “curved inward”?
- How much self-interest is normal? How much is healthy?
- When do you cross the line into sinful self-interest? How do you know where the line is?
- If sin is being curved inward, Rafael Malpica Padilla argues in the article, justification is the process of being “curved outward” by God’s grace. Do you agree with his point? Why or why not?
- How would you unpack the concept of being “curved outward”?
- How is being curved outward an antidote to the sin of being curved inward?
- What would being curved outward look like in daily life?
- Can one be too outwardly focused? Explain. How do you know where the line is?

Exercise 6: “Fruit of the Spirit”

Lutherans believe that we are saved by our faith and not our good works. Nevertheless our good works are appropriate and necessary expressions of Christian love for our neighbor. And the good works that accompany our faith arise from the transformation of heart that happens when the Spirit comes into our lives. Paul describes this transformation in his letters. For example, read Galatians 5:16-25 and discuss:

- What are the works of the flesh that Paul decries? What do the items on the list have in common with one another? Where do you see these things evidenced in your community and our world? What problems in the world are the result of these things? (Or, what problems in our world are not the result of these things?)
Study guide: Freed in Christ to serve the neighbor continued

- Contrasting works of the flesh, Paul lists the “fruit of the Spirit.” Describe the list. What do the items on the list have in common?

- How does God transform our hearts so we produce fruits of the Spirit? According to Paul, what role do we play in this sanctification of our lives? What does it mean to “live by the Spirit”?

- If someone is bearing fruit of the Spirit, what does that look like in daily living? How would that person integrate that fruit into her neighborhood and congregation, his community and world?

- Is it possible for someone to bear fruit of the Spirit without being in good relationship with neighbors? Why or why not?

- What connection do you see between our calling as believer-priests and producing fruit of the Spirit in our lives? Would this “fit” as an item on the job description for believer-priest?

- How is your life bearing fruit of the Spirit? What could you do better? How can you, with God’s help, do better?

Exercise 7: Jesus—spiritual trainer?
Malpica Padilla commented that for many North American Christians, Jesus is less a source of love for neighbor and more a “personal spiritual trainer” who “works on us one hour a week.” Discuss:

- What do you find true about his observation? Explain, using examples if you can. Or, what do you find missing from his observation?

- What’s wrong with thinking of Jesus as a personal spiritual trainer? Why is that one good image for a Christian to hold? Why is it not so good for Christians to hold only that image of Jesus?

- What other images would provide a healthy complement to Jesus as a personal spiritual trainer?

- In this comment, Malpica Padilla is critiquing not simply individual Christians, but our whole way of doing church. Do you agree? How can we do better as Lutherans? How can our congregations and our denomination do better? Why is it important that we try?

Exercise 8: Back to you
How would you answer the question, “What kind of priest are you?” How can you do better?
Thy Kingdom
Come
Thy Will be done
Visit the Sick
Pray for the Living and the Dead
Visit the Imprisoned
Bury the Dead
Feed the Hungry
Bear Wrongs Patiently
Comfort the Afflicted
Shelter the Homeless
Forgive Offences
Give Drink to the Thirst
Clothe the Naked
On Jan. 21, 2017, Rafael Malpica Padilla, executive director of ELCA Global Mission, donned his clerical collar and set out to join the Women’s March in downtown Chicago. On the way he encountered some women holding protest signs—including one that read: “Keep your rosaries out of my ovaries.”

“I asked the women if they were going to the march,” Malpica Padilla recalled, “and reluctantly they engaged me.” Eyeing his collar skeptically, they answered: Yes, they were marching. When he told them he was marching too, they replied with surprise and curiosity: “What kind of priest are you?”

The question “What kind of priest are you?” is about theological identity; it applies not only to priests, but to the priesthood of all believers—the church.

What kind of people of faith are we? For Lutherans, shaped by Martin Luther’s insight that all of life is part of our calling from God, the question of theological identity is not only about the interior faith of our hearts and minds, nor is it only a description of how we live within church walls. It’s also about the life of faith we live out in the world. This has always been the essence of Lutheran Christianity, Malpica Padilla argued, pointing to the “simple question” Luther posed in a 1519 sermon: “How do we stand before God, and how do we stand before neighbor?”
“At the heart of our Lutheran identity is a relationship with God—justification by faith,” Malpica Padilla said. Justification is a free gift of God’s grace apart from human works. But if justification is nothing less than the total restoration of our personal relationship with God, it is also something more: a transformation of our relationships with others.

For Lutherans, justification is “not only freedom from” sin and brokenness, it is “also freedom for” a purpose, he added.

Where Luther wrote that sin is being curved in on the self, “justification means striving toward the other,” Malpica Padilla said. “It is lifting your chin up so you can see the other—and not just the other who looks like you, but especially the other who is different from you.”

Love of God and neighbor, for Luther and for Lutherans today, is a theological identity that guides our whole lives. As Lutherans in the ELCA and around the world reflect on the past 500 years, it’s worth considering how the Reformation roots of social action continue to guide Lutheran identity and calling—exploring how we stand not only before God, but also before our neighbors. What kind of Christians are we today? And what kind of church will we become?

Reformation roots:
A holy calling and a Common Chest

In the 2016 collection The Forgotten Luther: Reclaiming the Social-Economic Dimension of the Reformation, Cynthia Moe-Lobeda wrote that Luther never wavered from his belief that “works do not cause salvation.” Still, “Luther also insisted that works are a vital part of life for people who are justified by Christ,” particularly “works that embody ‘love to our neighbor,’ ” she said.

Moe-Lobeda found that “for Luther, that norm of neighbor-love pertains to every aspect of life for the Christian.”

Ryan Cumming, program director for hunger education with ELCA World Hunger, notes that Luther’s opposition to indulgences stemmed in part from the fact that their sale created “opulence built on the backs of people who could barely afford to feed themselves.” This led Luther to write in his 95 theses that giving to the poor was “a better work” than purchasing indulgences, and that to buy an indulgence rather than help a neighbor in need was to purchase “the indignation of God.”

In the Large Catechism, Luther argued that the commandment against murder applies both to the taking of life and the failure to preserve it: “If you see anyone who is suffering from hunger and do not feed her, you have let her starve.”

Reflecting on the commandment against stealing, Luther also boldly critiqued the “free
The “public market” of his day: “The poor are defrauded every day, and new burdens and higher prices are imposed.” Luther urged Christians instead “to promote and further our neighbors’ interests, and when they suffer any want, we are to help, share, and lend to both friends and foes.”

As a way for the government to respond to the needs of the vulnerable, Luther and others in Wittenberg established a “Common Chest” in 1522. The chest offered financial support for orphans and poor children, dowry support for poor women, interest-free loans, refinancing for high-interest loans, education or vocational training for poor children, and vocational retraining for adults. Health care was added later, as the Common Chest funded the services of a town physician and paid the cost of hospital care and other treatments.

The Wittenberg Common Chest order spread to other cities and towns and became a model for how church and state could work together for the sake of all neighbors.

Hand in hand:
ELCA action, accompaniment and advocacy

The Reformation legacy of social action, rooted in a theological identity of freedom in Christ to serve the neighbor, can also be glimpsed in the history of Lutherans in North America, who built not only churches but also schools, hospitals and other social agencies.

The ELCA’s first social statement was “The Church in Society: a Lutheran Perspective,” adopted in 1991 (elca.org/socialstatements). It reads in part: “In faithfulness to its calling, this church is committed to defend human dignity, to stand with poor and powerless people, to advocate justice, to work for peace, and to care for the earth in the processes and structures of contemporary society.”

“This is Lutheran theology,” Malpica Padilla said. “We are free to see and engage the other, and mission cannot happen unless we see the face of God in the other.”

This theological orientation provides the foundation for accompaniment and advocacy, two related approaches to ELCA social action. “The other is not the object of my action. It is not ministry to, but ministry with and among the neighbor,” he said. “When we engage in social activity, it’s not ‘for them,’ but because, in working together, we are dismantling systems that prevent humanity from living in the full abundance promised by Jesus: life in relationship with God and with one another.”

Malpica Padilla knows that many Christians, especially in a divided and partisan culture, are reluctant to think of faith as “political.” This, he urged, should not prevent us from recognizing that “it is the work of Christians to advocate for the poor and marginalized.”

Citing Luke’s Gospel, which consistently frames Jesus’ mission as a reversal of an unjust social order, he added, “I cannot allow political ideology to claim for itself what belongs to the gospel. I am a committed follower of Jesus Christ; I do [what I do] because of the gospel.”
Faith in action:
World Hunger

Cumming describes his work with ELCA World Hunger (elca.org/hunger) as grounded in the love of neighbor. “Hunger is a system of broken relationships,” he said. “We know there is enough to feed people, but some are excluded and don’t have access to create and purchase food.” When we “seek out the image of God in our neighbors [and] see one another as revelations of God among us,” he said, we realize that “need doesn’t just exist ‘over there,’ in that other person, but in relationships with others.”

World Hunger funds an average of 250 grants each year to 60 countries through companion synods and partners. International grants support projects like eco-friendly farming, responses to malaria and HIV and AIDS, support for those affected by domestic violence or incarceration, and advocacy for human rights, including gender equity.

Cumming also views this work as rooted in a Lutheran understanding of vocation. “God has graced each person with gifts to share in the community, but if we can’t [due to need], the community suffers, and we suffer.”

Like Luther’s Common Chest, World Hunger supports partners in “helping people find ways to use their own talents and skills to provide for themselves and participate in the community,” Cumming said.

Faith in action:
Global Church Sponsorship

Despite growing up as the son of two pastors and attending an ELCA college, Andrew Steele, director for ELCA Global Church Sponsorship (elca.org/globalchurch), didn’t feel a strong connection to church as a young adult—until he spent a year in South Africa through the ELCA’s Young Adults in Global Mission (YAGM) program. “There, church was an integral part of life.... I learned so much about spirituality and public church,” he said.

Global Church Sponsorship supports long-term missionaries; the YAGM program; ministry projects by global partners, such as new church buildings and training workshops; and an international women leaders’ initiative that provides scholarships to women for ELCA seminaries and undergraduate programs.

The ELCA’s accompaniment model for global mission took getting used to, Steele admitted: “At first, you want to build and do things; then your job is to sit there and watch the water boil, and you think, ‘What am I doing here?’”

Steele’s epiphany came after he joined local farmers in planting a field of corn. After a long day’s labor, Steele was proud of his efforts—until he learned that guinea fowl had eaten all the corn and the planting would have to be done again. Sharing the experience with his South African neighbors, Steele realized he “wasn’t there to plant the corn. We were there to be humans together ... to live in community.”
Faith in action: Domestic Mission

When Stephen Bouman, director of ELCA Domestic Mission, considers a Lutheran approach to social action, he looks to “the powerful public nature of the sacraments.”

“Luther always called us to the world,” he said. “When we baptize a child, it’s baptismal ministry to follow her into the world ... we struggle for the world of that child.” Likewise, sharing communion also means considering those who need to eat, “extending the eucharist into the world,” he added.

Since 2009, Domestic Mission has been committed to making sure that at least 50 percent of new-start congregations serve immigrants, places of deep poverty or communities of color. In 2016 that number hit 57 percent. “We are slowly becoming a church that is changing [to reflect] what America is becoming,” Bouman said.

This strategy, far from a church dictated by culture, represents for Bouman a reclaiming of the roots of the Reformation—and Christianity itself.

2017:
The church at a crossroads

Five hundred years after the Reformation, the ELCA faces “a Lutheran crossroads” that will determine the future of the church, Malpica Padilla said. But for many Christians in a North American context, he said, Jesus is regarded less as the source of our love for neighbor and more as a “personal spiritual trainer—that’s how we have reduced Jesus, so that the trainer works on us one hour a week.”

The disconnect between self and neighbor, church and world, faith and action, means “we have domesticated Luther, [making him] hostage to cultural and institutional life,” he warned. “[Yet] our Lutheran identity pushes us into the world.”

If Lutherans reclaim the love of neighbor that was so central to the teachings of Jesus and Luther, Malpica Padilla believes “the core identity of our theology” will show our neighbors, including the “Spiritual but not religious,” that “Lutheran identity means something.”

On his way to the march that January day, when he was asked “What kind of priest are you?” Malpica Padilla responded by telling the women that he was a Lutheran pastor. As he shared with them the theological identity that prompted him to march, the women inquired: “Where is your church? We’d like to go.”

Faith in action, Malpica Padilla concluded, is not only identity and calling—it is also evangelism.
